BUSINESS TRAVEL: Travel Gadgets
By DAVID JONES

Years before anyone heard of severe acute respiratory syndrome, Ronald D. Salk, a travel executive based in Long Beach, Calif., frequently caught a cold or suffered from congestion after returning home from long-distance flights.

"I just chalked it up to the interior air in the cabin," said Mr. Salk, who is president of a company called Salk International that publishes an annual airport transit guide.

About four years ago, Mr. Salk began using a device called the Air Supply Mini-Mate, made by Wein Products of Los Angeles. It is a battery-operated air purifier that looks like a tiny black padlock and hangs around a user's neck. Mr. Salk says that since he began wearing the device, which costs $145 and supposedly kills 95 percent of airborne toxins, the breathing difficulties have disappeared.
